

Preface

Public relations is emerging as a major force in a growing global information society in the 21st century. Public relations as a discipline is still relatively young, beginning in the early 20th century but not really exploding until after World War II. Early efforts, for the most part, were publicity- and media-related events. However, as it has begun to mature, it has emerged with a management-oriented, relationship-building focus among its stakeholders with less emphasis on media tools and more on behavioral change. Also, as new social, interactive media tools are developing, there is more emphasis on using these tools to supplement the traditional media relations efforts.

The process of public relations continues to be grounded in the research, planning, action, and evaluation of the past, but many techniques of actually carrying out that process are being changed by technology. Surveys once done by interviewers door-to-door, or even by telephone, are more often done through the Internet today. The publics of public relations are still the major stakeholders for an organization whether they are employees, media, community members, consumers, or investors.

These critical changes in society and technology lend importance to the increasing emphasis in the management function of public relations. The practitioner may be a counselor in a public relations firm advising business and organizations on the important public relations positions and operations, or a vice president of a corporation sitting at the executive roundtable advising his or her peers of the consequences of some action. Practitioners are no longer mere technicians who shape and transmit messages from their organizations. They are professionals who manage the public relations function and build the relationships an organization has with its various constituencies. Public relations practitioners must possess the communication expertise and social sensitivity necessary to enable organizations to adapt to the changing environment.

Public relations professionals today must bring to their broadened role not only the traditional communication skills, but also the abilities to research and understand problems, to strategically plan public relations programs, to create effective messages using both the new social media as well as the traditional media, and to evaluate the effectiveness of these programs. The goal of this book is to provide you with an understanding of the principles underlying the practice of public relations while giving you a look at both the new communication opportunities and the trusted older tools for public relations practice. This we have tried to do within the historical context, the theoretical framework, and the legal and ethical foundation for the profession of public relations.

A multidisciplinary approach has characterized the text from its inception and is continued in this edition. We believe that by drawing on the experience of journalism, business, psychology, and communication professionals, we can present a comprehensive and inclusive overview of public relations. The education, research, and teaching experience of the authors in each of these disciplines addresses the needs of students who will be practicing in diverse environments.

We have tried to maintain an easy-to-read, personal style throughout the text. To that end, we have kept the jargon to a minimum and have provided definitions for all terms that are particular to the profession. In addition, we have attempted to give public relations students and practitioners the tools and knowledge they need in ways that reflect the reality of public relations. For example, Mini-cases provide insight into real-time activities conducted by organizations. Public relations Spotlights provide helpful information on topics such as James Grunig's public relations theories, and lessons learned from crisis such as Enron and BP.

ORGANIZATION OF THE TEXT

This edition retains the four-part organization of earlier editions: the profession, the process, the publics, and the practice. Part 1 describes the current public relations situation, its historical roots, theories, and ethical and legal concerns. Part 2 examines the core issues of the process that underlie public relations, whereas part 3 focuses on the publics that are the object of these efforts. Finally, part 4 summarizes the practice of public relations and looks at the emerging trends of the profession. We believe that this structure truly reflects the growth and development of public relations as an emerging profession.
