

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

We want to acknowledge all the research we have drawn on for this book. For those parts of management that do differ in the New Zealand context, we are completely dependent on researchers—usually local researchers—who investigate the ways in which our reality differs from the received wisdom from offshore. Without the work of these people, New Zealand would understand less about itself and the management practices that are effective here. Without their work this book could not have been written. Especially, we wish to thank Ron Bull who collaborated with Diane Ruwhiu in the writing of Chapter 3, our immediate research colleagues and members of the Competitive Advantage New Zealand (CANZ) research project.

McGraw-Hill and the authors would also like to thank the following people (listed in alphabetical order) for their most valuable comments on the draft manuscript during the review process:

- Joseph Beer, University of Auckland
- Peter Boxall, University of Auckland
- Eric Chong, Victoria University
- Paul Dalziel, Lincoln University
- Mark Dibben, Lincoln University
- Julie Douglas, Auckland University of Technology
- Elizabeth Hall, University of Otago
